In my application the user sends a multipart/form-data form post with a chunk of data in each part. At the server side the multipart/form-data information is parsed and the data is converted to s3 object. When a user uploads a file the file is converted in chunks as well. My current implementation is to convert the file in chunks and upload them to s3 in small pieces. I am not sure if this is the proper way to work with AWS S3 and currently I'm looking for an alternative approach. It would be better if the client sends a normal file upload and the server would upload chunks of data to s3 in the background as a service without the need to query s3 in the background for each chunk of data. I hope my question is clear enough, is there any different approach for this problem?
